Brad Newman is driving innovation at Cooley by working with legal professionals, business analysts, application developers and other stakeholders to identify, scope, design, iterate and implement practice and client-focused products, processes and services that enhance the gathering, processing and harnessing of actionable knowledge and data-centric intelligence to support the delivery of legal services to clients.

Prior to Cooley, Brad cofounded a legal technology startup focused on connecting startups with attorneys, then served as director of legal affairs at StartX, an accelerator for startup companies based out of Stanford. Before that, he practiced for several years at Ogilvy Renault (now part of Norton Rose Fulbright) in Toronto in their corporate/TTG group.
